other, and everything else. So we had a friendly little wager. And now I've jarred Senator Landis' memory. And the wager was, I would get...wager that there would be more people killed from fishing than there are killed from hunting. And I was correct, and he owed me a Coke. Fishing is more dangerous than hunting, because people drown. And fishing...actually, we had more people drown from fishing activities than we do from activities like jet skis and pleasure boating and water-skiing. So be careful if you're a fisherman. You never know. But the smart fisherman, of course, wears a life jacket. Finally, I would say the Game and Parks Commission manages over 200 public use areas that are free. These areas are designated as wildlife management areas. And you can see them on the map that's distributed on the tables. These areas are not groomed, they're not mowed, and they're very primitive. They do not have developed playground or picnic areas, as our state parks do. However, these areas are open for public use year-round. Therefore, people who do not want to pay a park permit fee do have at least 200 areas they can go to and not pay a fee. But if you go to a park fee that has the facilities, like rest rooms, camping areas, and so on, these are areas that are hard to maintain, and they're expensive to maintain. And so there is...necessary to have a fee. Now, I've passed you out a chart. You will note that there are 39 states that charge a park entry fee. There are 11 that do not. The 11 that do not, there are various reasons. Missouri charges, I believe, an eighth of a cent sales tax to support their parks. Iowa does not have a very extensive park system, so they don't charge. But you won't find many people, probably, going to Iowa to visit their park facilities. Nebraska has a very extensive park system, and it is used by a lot of citizens in our state and out of state. Matter of fact, 15 of the top 25 tourist destinations in the state of Nebraska are facilities run by Game and Parks. Cumulatively speaking, Game and Parks manage the number one tourist areas in our states. You take all the people that are coming to Nebraska that are engaged in tourism activities, Game and Parks is where they're going to be, more than likely. That's the number one area. And I think it's safe to say the Game and Parks Commission strives to provide our citizens with a diverse system of outdoor recreation activities, whether it be nice places like Eugene Mahoney, or hiking-biking trails,
